Candidates think about them in all the ways that Super PACs, political parties and television ads do. But how does it work? Doing your homework is how we've been living our lives, but sometimes it seems like the rules go out the window. That can be doubly true if you're working a federal campaign. Research is king. But research is hard, especially if you're a newcomer and you don't have resources at your disposal. Here's a research tip we've found to be useful and effective. Start with your data: You want to get a sense of where your likely voter sets are by how your data is defined. Are you using a sample based on a random-digit-dial phone survey? Or, do you have a database of people's voting histories that you're able to use for sampling purposes? So if you have a database based on actual returns
